The reading of Mr. Boswell-Stone's Shakespeare's Holinshed suggested to me the possibility of a similar study of Holinshed's relation to the non-Shakespearean historical plays. To my great surprise, however, I soon found myself interested in The Chronicle for the Chronicle's own sake, first as representative of a large class of people in every age of the world; second, as representative of this class in relation to the special problems of the Elizabethan age. Obviously in such a study the drama, from certain points of view so intimately connected with the Chronicle, has fallen into distinctly second place, and will be used merely either to illustrate or to supplement or to enforce...
