Recognition of the fact that classes must be conducted in a spirited manner and that since the class exercise is designed to teach all of its members, contributions should be received from the majority, if not from all, rather than several contributions from a few pupils. 3. Recognition of the fact that since the language exercise is to train pupils in habits of correct English, the teacher must give them an opportunity to express themselves freely rather than do the greater portion of the oral work herself. 4. Recognition of the fact that careful and definite oral composition should precede the written work in the intermediate grades in order to insure successful accomplishment. 5. Recognition of the value of definiteness in the work. The lessons In grammar were on the whole well-conducted. Teachers were definite in their requirements and thorough in their work. Some weaknesses observed were: 1. In a number of instances, lessons dependent for their successful accomplishment upon spontaneity and enthusiasm were conducted formally. One illustration of this was a language game which failed to accomplish its aim because its formal and uninteresting presentation made so slight an impression upon the pupils. The teacher conducted it without spirit, did not acquaint pupils with its purpose, called upon them in regular order, and abruptly discontinued the game at the end of the period. There was no effort made to have pupils...
